LITERATURE :

The language of the Andhra is also called Telugu and its literature is in many respects a continuation of Sanskrit literacy thought and tradition. Place midway between the North and the South, i.e., the so-called Aryan and Dravidian cultures, Andhra developed wonderful and fine blending of both. Having a Dravidian origin in its basic vocabulary and structure Telugu imbibed the vigour of Sanskrit thought and expressing and thus created a new style with the best elements of both. Seats of Sanskrit studies also moved from Kashmir and Kanouj, Ujjain and Benares to Warrangal and Vijayanagara, Rajahmundry and Nellore so much to that every Telugu poet felt himself a descendant of Vyasa or Valmiki, Bhasa or Kalidasa and translations of great Sanskrit works were made and read out to vast audiences who heard with rapt attention, by eminent poets who had an excellent command over both Sanskrit and Telugu. The Telugu poet took his inspiration from and looked for guidance to Sanskrit masters and the Telugu epic or Kavya, Nataka or Champu was shaped after the Sanskrit models. Telugu grammar followed the Sanskrit method while Rhetoric was complete importation from Sanskrit. Telugu poetic thought is almost a logical continuation of that of the Sanskrit poets and in fact many of descendants of the Sanskrit masters rendered their thought into Telugu. In all technical studies, dance and music, art and science the Sanskrit marga system formed the basis for the later desi superstructure, the terminology and guiding rules being Sanskrit while the execution i.e., way of expressing or presentation, was moulded by the local or regional styles.

Though Telugu poetry appears to have had its start at about the seventh or eighth centuries A.D., as found in inscriptions, the first available book is that of Nannayabhatta, the Andhra Mahabharata, composed in the middle of the eleventh century (A.D. 1050-1061), based on the Sanskrit original. Every later writer considered Nannaya as the “Adikavi” or the first Telugu poet and vak-anusasana or ordainer of the languages. Probably there was no kavya worth the name before him and he gave best model for poetical composition and set up a standard for fine style. All the Sanskrit Itihasas, Puranas, Kavyas and chapus were rendered into Telugu.
